

Beaver Creek Interior Alaska, White Mountains

A wild and scenic river, Beaver Creek seeks its way through the White Mountains, a lime stone formation in Alaska's interior. The river originates in this mountain range, approximately 50 miles northeast of Fairbanks and flows along jagged limestone peaks towards the Yukon River. Ahead of us are 127 miles of a designated National Wild and Scenic River, most of it within the White Mountains Recreation Area. The river's clear, moderately swift water and unparalleled scenery make for a remote but relaxing trip. We have great opportunities on the first few days for hikes into the surrounding mountains.

Day 1: Fairbanks, Alaska

Pre-trip meeting, we go through gear, food and run if necessary last minute errands

Day 2: Drive on the Steese Highway

A two hour drive brings us to Nome Creek about 60 miles northeast of Fairbanks. We set up our boats and hit the river for our first log of about 10 miles.

Day 3 to Day 7: On the river

The river offers a lot of variety. Moderately swift water lets you enjoy this float trip. Watch for moose, black bear or even a grizzly along the river. Further into the trip we have the chance to see Dall sheep grazing on the slopes of the White Mountains. Beaver Creek offers outstanding fishing for arctic grayling.

Day 8: Flight back to Fairbanks

A gravel bar will be the landing strip for our bush plane. Overnight in Fairbanks.
